multiple people on his way to find Babur's uncle (his mother's brother) Mahmud Khān. Babur mentions that Qasim took away the championship, which in the Moghūl context meant that anyone who charged in to lead the campaign would be entitled to maximum benefits during each feast thereon.

Babur's guardian, Khudai-Birdi Beg was hit by a crossbow on the first day of the battle and died. One of Ibrahim Saru's crossbowmen was excellent and Babur acknowledged to have never seen anyone better than him. Instructions were given to construct pits in a couple of places to run mines. Attempts were being made to take the fort as quickly as possible. The siege lasted forty days. After having lost all the resources, he decided to go on in mediation with Khwaja-i-Qazi from Babur's side. In June of AD 1495, he came out with his sword and quiver hanging from his neck. Finally, he surrendered the fort to Babur.

On the other hand, problems were waiting for Babur in Khujand. For quite a long time, it had been dependent on Umar Shaikh Mīrzā's diwan, but after the turbulence caused by his death, they had begun to align towards Sulṭān Ahmad Mīrzā. Babur with the guidance of elders and well-wishers was able to crush this rising rebellion with ease. He sent out a strong party to Khujand which was now being controlled by Mir Moghūl's father, Abdul Wahhab Shaghwal and he didn't hesitate much to surrender. Babur wanted to settle things with Sulṭān Mahmud Khān on a good note. He considered him to be close and thought that only dialogue could settle things. Babur thought that if the bygone resentments were laid aside, it would bring the two close again. Thinking so, Babur went to Shahrukhiya. Sulṭān Mahmud Khān was seated in a tent in the middle of the garden. Babur entered the tent and knelt three times to honour him. In return, Mahmud Khān rose in respect. Both looked into each other's eyes, and the Khān returned to his seat. After the twelve-year-old Babur had again knelt, Mahmud called him to his side in a show of affection and fondness. The initial meeting between the two relatives indeed went well.

Babur spent three days there and set off for Akhsi and Andijān passing by the Kindirlik pass. At Akhsi, Babur circumambulated around his father's tomb. He left the place at the hour of Friday prayer and reached Andijān by the Band-i-Salar road between the evening and night prayers.

In the wilds of Andijān lived a tribe called Jigrak, located in the mountains between Kashghar and Ferghana. The tribe had around 6000 households and kept horses, sheep and yaks. With the ambiguity of borders, they also had the
