tradition of not paying any tribute. Babur sent out an army led by Qasim Beg to collect the tribute and ordered to have them distributed among the soldiers. Qasim nabbed around 20,000 sheep and 15,000 horses. He shared them with all of his men.

After this campaign against Jigraks, the army set out to Aūrā-tīpā. It was once held by Umar Shaikh Mīrzā, but after his demise, it had slipped into the hands of Sulṭān Ali Mīrzā on behalf of his elder brother Baysonghor Sulṭān Mīrzā.

Hearing of Babur's upcoming attack, he ran to Macha hill country leaving land under his guardian, Shaikh Zun-nun Arghun. From halfway between Khujand and Aūrā-tīpā, Khalifa was sent as an envoy to Shaikh Zun-nun. Shaikh behaved wrongly on this occasion and ordered his death, but somehow Khalifa was able to escape and reach Babur in three days. Babur and his troops had almost reached Aūrā-tīpā, but the approaching winter forced them to turn back.

Although Babur's men retired, the new ally Mahmud Khān advanced. His men moved forward and Zun-Nun was unable to defend himself. Thus, he surrendered. Mahmud Khān offered the place to Muhammad Husain Kurkan Dughlat. Aūrā-tīpā remained under his control until AD 1503.
