Once Sulṭān Husayn Mīrzā reached Ḥisār, he laid a strong seige. The records say that there was no rest, day nor night, from the labours of mining and attack, of working catapults and mortars. Mines were run in four or five places.

When the first mine set towards the gate went well, the counter-attack came as a surprise to Sulṭān Husayn Mīrzā. The folks from the town showed amazing courage in the face of adversity. They did terrific counter-mining, and the smoke was thrust down on Mīrzā's army by closing the void. The closure to the hole pushed the smoke strongly, and the men on Mīrzā's side appeared to buzz like bees from a disturbed hive. Babur has mentioned that the men in distress hurriedly fled from the maw of death.

The account mentions that the townsmen poured jars and jars of hot water on the besiegers forcing them out of their own mine's mouth.

The records also mention that one of the discharges of catapults and mortars had cracked the fort's tower. But when Mīrzā's men looked at carrying the assault through the cracks, they were instructed not to do so considering it was night.

In another surprise for Mīrzā and his horde, the besieged had rebuilt the whole tower by the next dawn. Interestingly, no assault was ordered for the next day. Almost ten weeks went by without any attacks by Mīrzā's begs. Occasionally, they made blockades by mining, rearing head-strikes and discharging stones.

Husayn Mīrzā had sent his son Badi'-al-Zaman Mīrzā loaded with a strong troop against Khusrau Shah.

A Brief About Badi-'al-Zaman Mīrzā

Badi-'al-Zaman Mīrzā was a Tīmūrid ruler of Herat from AD 1506 to 1507. He was the son of Husayn Bayqarah, who was a great-great-grandson of Timur Beg.[*] The records tell us that in the 1490s, he was in conflict with his father. Husayn had transferred Badi from his governorship in Astarabad (present-day Gorgan) to Balkh, and then passed over Badi's son Muhammad Mu'min to replace him in Astarabad. This made Badi highly furious and he launched a rebellion. He was defeated and his son, who had been imprisoned in Herat, was executed. Husayn finally made peace with
