Khusrau was in a big rush to seize as much as possible. He sent Wali with a large force to besiege Shebarghan. Wali was also instructed to raid and ravage the thereabouts. But Wali was unable to execute the siege. Frustrated and anguished, he sent his men to plunder the clans and hordes of the Zardak Chul. Zardak is a village located in Saral Rural District, of Kurdistan Province in Iran. It is also known as Zartak in current times. He took away more than a lakh of sheep and some 3000 camels. Then he proceeded to plunder San-Chirik, a country on the way back. He raided and captivated the clans all around at last joining Khusrau Shah before Balkh.

The madness of destruction was high on the minds of Khusrau Shah. On one fine day during the siege, Khusrau Shah sent Nazar Bahadur to destroy the water channels of Balkh.

This time, Tingri Birdi Samanchi confronted them with the support of eighty men. He beheaded Nazar Bahadur and carried his head to the fort. Tingri was one the most favoured begs of Sulṭān Husayn Bayqara Mīrzā.

Sulṭān Husayn Bayqara Mīrzā and Badiuz Zaman Mīrzā

The very same year, Sulṭān Husayn Bayqara Mīrzā led his army to Bast. He set his camp there with the intent to defeat Zunnun Arghun and his son, Shah Shuja. They had turned out to become retainers of Badiuz Zaman Mīrzā. Zunnun had given his daughter to Zaman and had taken a hostile position for himself.

Sulṭān Husayn Bayqara Mīrzā's cornering of Bast had cut off its core supply. Hunger had begun to starve them. As hunger reigned, the darogah of Bast surrendered. But without taking much and marching ahead, Sulṭān Husayn Bayqara Mīrzā retired to Khurasan. This was the second time that he had to return without taking an inch of either Ḥisār or Qandahar, despite having an upper hand and a great army.

This had vexed his sons and begs. The cloud of revolt came in as spring had just set in.

Sulṭān Husayn sent a large army under Muhammad Wali Beg to put down (his son) Muhammad Husayn Mīrzā while he stayed in Nishin meadow (near Herat).
