It had been a year since Babur had met Sulṭān Ali Mīrzā. Things were well settled between the two. As per the agreement, that summer, Sulṭān Ali was supposed to come from Bukhara and Babur from Andijān to seize Samarkand. Keeping his word, Babur left Andijān in May of AD 1497. But as he reached Yar Yilaq, he got to know that the two Mīrzās (Ali and Baysonqor) had already opened fronts against each other. Babur sent Tulun Khwaja Moghūl (the Baburnama uses Mughul) ahead with around ten to fifteen scores of warriors.

Babur claims that the advance of his troop headed by Tulun, had caused Baysonqor Mīrzā to panic and he chose to retire from the front. But Babur's men didn't let them go at ease. They attacked them and not only beat Baysonqor's horde but even collected a mass of spoils.

The jubilant men of Babur had reached Shiraz in two days after having defeated the men of Baysonqor.

In that period, Qasim Baig Duldai ruled the land of Shiraz for whom fate was not going to be so fortunate, rather it was fortunate more for Babur. It was the last day of Ramzan in AD 1497. The sub-governor of Qasim surrendered to save his life. Perhaps he did not fight enough as well. Babur handed over the place to Ibrahim Sarus and the very next day, on Eid-ul-Fitr, Babur rode back to Samarkand with his warriors.

Perhaps, this Eid was set to bring only good news for Babur. As he marched further with his trip, he met Qasim Duldai, Wais Laghari, Hasan (Muhammad Sighai's Grandson) and Sulṭān Muhammad Wais along with twenty scores of men. They were here to break a deal of interest with Babur. They offered their services and loyalty to Babur by stating, 'Baysonqor Mīrzā came and ran away leaving us behind and hence we have decided to leave him and offer ourselves for the service of Padshah.' Though Babur clarified this as well in his memoir that they had left Baysonqor on his request to defend Shirza but when they found that Babur's men had already captured the land and nothing much could be done, they chose to join hands with him.

Passing the Qarabolaq, Babur's group had just crossed the river Zarafshan. The enthusiastic men of Babur were able to catch hold of Baysonqor Mīrzā. In the minor battle, a spear struck Sulṭān Ahmad Tambal's neck. He was killed without being unhorsed. Khwajaki Mulla-i-
