While he was on his way, Governor Sayyid Hussain Akbar’s land came hard on Baysonqor near Tirmiz, at the Amu Darya ferry. Hussain Akbar was the confidant and kinsman of Sulṭān Masud Mīrzā. Although Baysonqor Mīrzā could cross the river, one of his important aides, Mirim Tarkhān, was drowned in the ruckus while the rest were captured.

When Baysonqor Mīrzā reached Khusrau Shah, he showed enough compassion.

The news of his departure had reached Babur’s ears. Without wasting any time, Babur got on his horse and other men and rode to Samarkand from the Khwaja Didar. As they approached Samarkand’s core part, the nobles gave them an honourable reception one by one. Perhaps, the city of Samarkand was ready to open doors to the new Sulṭān.

The climate had gotten intensely cold by the end of November of AD 1497. They entered the citadel and dismounted at the Bu-Stan Sarai. Babur was finally able to take hold of Samarkand completely.