The loss of men was a massive loss to the young ruler, Babur. It came very hard on him and he often wept in isolation.

Babur and the remaining party returned to Khujand. As a gesture of compassion, his mother and maternal grandmother were sent to him. The families of some other men in exile were also sent with Babur.

They spent the whole Ramzan of AD 1498 in Khujand. Again, Sulṭān Mahmud Khān agreed to support Babur in his quest for Samarkand. Sulṭān Mahmud Khān sent his son Sulṭān Muhammad Khānika, and a party of 5000 men led by his guardian Ahmad Beg.

Babur mounted to ride towards Samarkand and win it again. Khānika, Ahmad and their troops waited to join Babur at Aūrā-tīpā.

Babur's men took the route of Yar-Yilaq, past the fort of Burka Yilaq. This fort was the headquarter of the darogah of the district. Sulṭān Muhammad and Ahmad Beg on the other hand rode on another road much slower than Babur's horde. By the time they had reached Yar-Yilaq, news of Shaybāni Khān raiding Shiraz came. Hearing so, they decided to turn back.

Babur again felt helpless and deserted. He had to again turn back to Khujand. The desire and ambition to rule kept flaming inside Babur. Perhaps he was anxious once more. The throneless Babur yet again asked for help from his uncle Sulṭān Mahmud Khān. This time for Andijān.

Responding to Babur's call, the Khān appointed Sayyid Muhammad Husain Dughlat, Ayub Begchik, Jan Hasan Barin along with 8000 men in aid. With this big reinforcement, Babur rode, crossing Kand-i-Badam. But somehow this campaign too failed and he had to return to Khujand.
