One may then ask, what harm does the narration through the academia and NCERT books bring? However brutal it may seem in my opinion, it is not merely wee-sized harm, but a catastrophe set to dismantle the pride and respect of our land and civilization. I state it with utmost responsibility and honesty after having gone through abundant primary sources about varied historical anecdotes. I'll leave the readers with one such instance of the past. The NCERT books tell us that after looking at the blood the great Ashoka shed in the battle of Kalinga, guilt caught up with him[2] and he chose to be inducted into the faith of compassion, Buddhism.

Interestingly, the primary source that the academic book on Ashoka cites,[*] disagrees with the former.[3] As per the primary source (cited), Ashoka was already a Buddhist when he attacked Kalinga.[†]

Of the hundreds of thousands of such historical instances, I have cared to cite just one. Now, keep your hand on your heart and ask, isn't it unethical that which it is being inflicted upon us? What do we call it? Intellectual dishonesty?

It is bound to happen. And why not . . .? When the gatekeepers of narratives chose to tell what our latest colonialists (British) and their loyalists wanted to spread around.[4] While Scott was analytical about the effect of the British-tailored education system of India, Macaulay had emphasized it as a goal in the 'Minute on Indian Education', 1835:[*]

> We must at present do our best to form a class who may be interpreters between us and the millions whom we govern; a class of persons, Indian in blood and colour, but English in taste, in opinions, in morals, and in intellect. To that class we may leave it to refine the vernacular dialects of the country, to enrich those dialects with terms of science borrowed from the Western nomenclature, and to render them by degrees fit vehicles for conveying knowledge to the great mass of the population.

This circumstantial set of evidence clearly hints at why propagated academic history has been in form as it is. Even I couldn't save myself from becoming a prey to it.

Coming back to my teenage days—after the days of school were over, I stepped into undergraduate studies aspiring to specialize in architecture. This was a phase where I not only made the architectural drawings but also read more and more. The architectural school (that's what I have seen) is that part of the world where the literature on the subject is highly post-modern, and a rational mind is quite prone to get drenched in communism and woke-ism.[5] It gave me the sense to grasp the history of the structural model, led mostly by Antonio Francesco Gramsci.[†]
