Andijān as the Ashpari, Turuqshar, Chikrak and around. On the other hand, Babur sent Ibrahim Saru, Wais Laghari and Sayyidi Qara to induce people on the other side of Khujand River.

Babur had left no stone unturned to get more and more support and loyalty from every corner possible with the intent to prepare a stronghold. He was indeed an ambitious ruler though history does not go by his will in the larger part of his life.

Seeing Babur's progress, Auzun and Tambal were not going to remain silent for long. They gathered the Moghūl soldiers thereby selecting those who had once served in the armies of Andijān and Akhsi. Soon, they travelled to Sapan, having Jahangir Mīrzā as their companion and they dismounted two miles east from Marginal intending to besiege it.

To materialize the intention, they prepared quite well and advanced in a couple of days reaching the edge of the suburbs.

Babur's strength wasn't anything to boast of during this period. Of his many great commanders, Qasim Beg, Ibrahim Saru and Wais Laghari etc. were some of the few veterans left with him. With whatever was left, Babur made the formation and marched up thereby preventing the group of Auzun and Tambal from making any further advance.

Having stopped their advance, Babur took a sigh of relief and on the other hand, his diplomacy had begun to show colours. He had sent Qasim Beg into the hills of the south of Andijān. After his deliberations, the Ashpari, Turuqshar, Chiraq, and other tribes had come in Babur's support. The commanders, Ibrahim Saru and Wais Laghari had crossed the river reaching the other side of Akhsi. The fort of Pap and many other areas were now in Babur's hands with the enormous support of local clans.

Auzun Hasan's and Tambal's tyranny had woven the thread of great misery among the peasants, resulting in each of the local clans supporting Babur.

While Auzun Hasan and Tambal were running away, Hasan Dikcha, the chief of one of the tribes collected a local mob in Akhsi, who being full of rage, lynched them. Then, they invited the commanders, Ibrahim Saru, Wais Laghari and Sayyidi Qara into the fort. Now, it seemed Babur's good time was about to begin.

Banda Ali, the son of Kukuldash and Haji Ghazi Manghit, was appointed by Sulṭān Mahmud Khān to support Babur in administering the newly amalgamated regions. Haji Ghazi Manghit had just escaped from the
