joining Tambal.

Andijān Is Recovered

Babur heard the news of Andijān being recovered and that no opposition existed there. Babur saw a ray of hope and rode out from Margilal at dawn and reached Andijān by mid-day.

One can collect from the writings of Babur that he was on cloud nine, after having received Andijān, his ancestor's land once again.

He saw two sons of Nasir Beg along with Dost Beg and Mirim Beg. He was kind enough to have them in his favour and inducted them as his loyals.

Finally, in June of AD 1498, Andijān got Babur as its ruler.

And on the other hand, Sultān Ahmad Tambal was joined by Jahangir Mīrzā on his way to Osh. As they entered Osh, Babur's sympathizers attacked their party there too, and somehow only with very few followers Tambal, Jahangir and others confounding themselves could make it to the Auzkint Fort.

Auzun Hasan had safely reached Akhsi and had taken refuge in the fort there. But Babur was in no mood to let him stay safe for long. He was the root of the rebellion and Babur wanted to crush him in the worst way possible.

The news of Auzun's safe passage had reached Babur five days after taking over Andijān. Furious, Babur marched out to Akhsi to teach Auzun a lesson. The tide had begun to sway on Babur's side. On his arrival, helpless Auzun pleaded to grant the status. A kneeling Auzun melted Babur's heart and he thought of forgiving him and no harm was done.

Babur and his whole party stayed in Akhsi for a week to settle the administration. Babur also wanted to settle the administration of Kasan and the nearby countryside.

Now that the issues of Andijān, Akhsi were settled, Babur relieved the Moghūl mercenaries and they were allowed to return to Tashkent. Babur along with his remaining men returned to Andijān. He took Auzun Hasan, his family and dependents with him. Babur had left behind Qasim-i-Ajab by promoting him to the rank of beg to take care of Akhsi.
