soundness of the Bank's structure was restored and the Bank went on to celebrate its Silver Jubilee.'[19]

Nanporia says that given the fouled atmosphere of 1928, even trivial issues became matters of moment in their eyes. Matters which would normally have been left to Sorabji's discretion were the object of scrutiny and often complaint; and Sorabji saw every inquiry into his affairs as a deliberate provocation. It is possible that the Board in an attempt to cut Sorabji down to size began to question his decisions on matters of staff and internal management, which in the absence of a vitiated atmosphere would have attracted little attention. Sir Phiroze Sethna described them as 'small counts' giving the impression that Sorabji was being challenged on relatively petty issues which in other circumstances would not have merited the attention of the Board.

It appears that many of the complaints and charges against Sorabji were not the cause of any crisis, but were picked up and blown out of proportion because of the prevailing atmosphere. As Nanporia says, 'It was one thing for an inquiry to be held after a misdemeanour or irregularity was reasonably established. It was quite another to hunt for irregularities under the supposition that they were there to be discovered. Most of the inquiries before and after Sorabji's departure for Europe were of the latter kind.'[20] Inquiries were instituted but nothing irregular came to light. In fact there was a silence on the outcome of most. A full audit on the eve of Sorabji's departure for Europe showed that there were no irregularities.

According to Nanporia, Sir Dinshaw did not understand that there was no necessary conflict between a consolidated institution and the spirit of enterprise which Sorabji continued to embody. The insinuation was that Sorabji was impatient with institutionalized methods and that the management of many of the branches left much to be desired. But his many achievements hardly gave credence to such a charge. Sorabji had revolutionized branch expansion, introduced the system of local boards, emphasized regional needs, provided for periodical branch inspection and extensive audit. These could hardly be said to be the product of a person who was opposed to systematization or institutionalization. It is possible that Sir Dinshaw who was an economist given to launching a thorough inquiry and basing his decisions on a plethora of facts and figures would have found Sorabji's seemingly snap decisions based on a sixth sense
