Moraes's Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas; C.D. Deshmukh's The Course of My Life; Aparna Basu's G.L. Mehta: A Many Splendoured Man; Aditya Mukherjee's Imperialism, Nationalism and the Making of the Indian Capitalist Class, 1902–1947; G. Balachandran's John Bullion's Empire; Anand Chandavarkar's Keynes and India: A Study in Economics and Biography; and B.K. Nehru's Nice Guys Finish Second. As far as articles are concerned my biggest debt is to G. Balachandran's 'Towards a Hindoo Marriage: Anglo-Indian Monetary Relations in Interwar India, 1917–35', Rajul Mathur's 'The delay in the formation of the Reserve Bank of India: the India Office Perspective', Anand Chandavarkar's 'Central Bank and Government: An Untold Story from RBI's Early History', and R.K. Talwar's 'Public Sector Banking'. The last named has served as the basis for much of Chapter 25.

I owe an immense debt of gratitude to Abhik Ray, author of the two magisterial State Bank of India histories cited above. In addition to his books, from which I have drawn freely, Abhik was kind enough to provide me with books and research material. He provided inestimable guidance to research sources and shared his own research material and notes without stint. I am also grateful to him for providing photographs of R.K. Talwar. I have benefited greatly from discussions with him and from his clarifications over email. He has also spared me the blushes on more than one occasion by drawing my attention to factual errors. I can only hope that this book meets his high standards.

S.S. Tarapore graciously agreed to read the many drafts I inflicted upon him, and made suggestions which bore the unmistakable impress of his expertise, skill, and intellectual rigour. He also shared my enthusiasm for the book and was invaluable in offering useful perspectives and making insightful suggestions. He also proved to be an excellent sounding board. His meticulous perusals of the evolving manuscript and detailed remarks have greatly improved this book. It has been a rare privilege to have him as mentor and intellectual companion. However, I alone am responsible for any errors which remain, and can only hope that they are few and far between. His wife Farida was always a gracious host, and her tasty snacks (mini-meals in fact) made the sessions with her husband that much more worthwhile. Her snacks alone are reason enough to write another book.
