Councillorship but Purshotamdas did not take the bait. Thus even the second attempt ended in abject failure.

But further unpleasantness was in store for Purshotamdas when Sir Rajendranath Mookerjee launched a tirade against him at the last meeting of the Commission (at the India Office). The immediate provocation (if it could be called that), was Hilton Young's declaration that he had decided to admit Purshotamdas's Minute of dissent. Purshotamdas who had already had more than his share of criticism retired to another room while Sir Rajendranath continued his diatribe. When Sir Norcot Warren came to say good-bye and Purshotamdas asked him if he was aware of the intemperate language Sir Rajendranath was using against him, Warren remarked: 'The Chairman in any case should never have allowed him to say anything at this stage.'[25] Obviously Hilton Young was still smarting from the two abortive attempts at dissuading Purshotamdas from signing his Minute of dissent. Sir Alexander Murray, another member, congratulated Purshotamdas on his stand by saying that if he were an Indian he would have done the same. Purshotamdas was quick to retort: 'In that case Murray, it is evident that you were on the Commission not to safeguard the interests of India but of England.'[26] Unfazed by the putdown, Sir Alexander observed that not only he, but all the members on the Commission had done just that, and this was why Purshotamdas deserved to be congratulated.