Purshotamdas refused to accept the argument that Indians lacked enterprise or the capacity to compete with foreigners on equal terms. According to him the two main reasons for this foreign domination was the fact that the control of shipping and banking were in the hands of non-Indians. He argued that it was wrong to suggest that the indigenous banker was a rapacious and dishonest person. He pointed out that a hundi was rarely dishonoured and while conceding its deficiencies, emphasized that it was essential in rural areas where it was the readiest and often the only means available to the small agriculturist and the minor industrialist. While he was aware that many of the banks which sprang up under the impetus of swadeshi collapsed, many of the early European-run banks too had had been driven to the wall.

It was the monopoly of foreign trade by non-Indians which Purshotamdas was firmly against and in a Minute of dissent (on the subject of the financing of foreign trade) which bore his unmistakable imprint, and which was signed by five others, highlighted the inequity of the foreign trade of the country being almost exclusively in the hands of foreigners. The Minute was in the main an indictment against the monopoly enjoyed by the exchange banks. Purshotamdas and his colleagues disagreed with the majority view that the facilities available for financing India's foreign trade, both imports and exports were sufficient. Nor did they agree with the view that there was no need for the establishment of an Indian exchange bank strong enough to compete successfully with foreign exchange banks. In his Minute Purshotamdas recommended the immediate setting up of an exchange bank with a capital of ₹3 crores with the entire capital being subscribed by the State. The bank was to finance the country's export and import trade in the same manner as the foreign banks did thereby giving Indians a legitimate share in financing of foreign trade.

Reserve Bank of India: The final stages of the inquiry coincided with the constitutional talks in London under the aegis of the Round Table Conference. Some tentative proposals on the setting up of the Reserve Bank of India had emerged from the deliberations and the Chairman thought it fit to rule that the inquiry would not discuss the details of the constitution of the Reserve Bank. Purshotamdas while respecting that ruling observed: 'Although we are unable to appreciate the necessity, or, the justification, for ruling out the consideration of the question by the Committee, we respected
