Apart from Purshotamdas's Minute of dissent there were two others. The first of these was by Ramdas Pantalu who dealt with indigenous banking and the second was by Nalini Ranjan Sarkar which dealt with the financing of trade and financial needs of the industries. With a membership of twenty-one drawn from different persuasions and with differing backgrounds it is not surprising that there was no unanimity in the report. Manu Subedar, who was one of the Indian economists on the Committee, submitted a separate report which was a tome in itself and covered ground common to both the Majority Report and his own. However, if there was one common thread which ran right through the report, it was the assumption that the administration of the provinces and the central government would be in the hands of ministers responsible to their respective Legislatures.

The Committee's other important recommendations included post office deposit facilities, the stock exchange, setting up an All India Banking Association as a common forum for bankers' problems, and banking education. 'It felt that banks should aim at combining the reputed efficiency of European systems with the proverbial economy of indigenous bankers.'[13]

The report was a rich store-house of economic data and has since been drawn upon heavily by both government and students of banking and economics. It was a remarkable report that 'saw the problems of the banking industry with clarity and gave solutions on all aspects of banking in India. Its findings and recommendations are as relevant today as then. Social control and bank nationalization introduced a number of new ideas and innovations, especially easier credit facilities for the priority sectors, and wider banking services and facilities, many of which the Committee foresaw.'[14] Purshotamdas's contributions showed not only his capacity for analysis but also his ability to see things as a whole. He saw the growth of Indian banking not in isolation but as part of the nation's economic and financial development.
