The main objective was to ensure that the bank functioned as a purely commercial organization implementing a policy laid down by the Indian Legislature. Purshotamdas argued that this objective could only be achieved if the bank was free to select its own officers and appoint them with the approval of the government. He observed that it was unlikely that with the Governor General as the appointing authority the bank would be entirely free of political influence since the Governor General was constitutionally bound to act under the orders of the Secretary of State for India, himself a member of the British Cabinet, and subject to the influence of the majority in Parliament. Purshotamdas's fears were not without foundation. When C.D. Deshmukh was being considered as a candidate for the Governor, there was opposition from both New Delhi and London despite his impeccable credentials for the post (he was already a Deputy Governor), and his having the full backing of the Board and public opinion.
