unduly hamper the appointing authority but said that they were prepared to face the necessity for amending legislation in case practice showed that this was really so. They felt that this clause was required to exclude certain types of appointments which they considered undesirable.

The Finance Member, Sir George Schuster, and James Taylor (later Sir), who became successively Deputy Governor and Governor, recorded a Minute of dissent in regard to the requirement of 'tested banking experience'[15] for the Governor. Taylor observed: 'The qualifications and experience required for the head of a Central Bank are quite different from those which are necessarily acquired in commercial banking, while if experience of the latter is the only qualification, a five year period would be quite inadequate. The experience of many countries goes to show that men of quite different training have been selected for and proved successful in central banking, and the present heads of the important Central Banks would have been excluded as ineligible under the qualifications proposed by the Committee.'[16]

When the matter came up for discussion in the Assembly, V.K.A. Ayangar, a Finance Ministry official who had played an important role in drafting the legislation, supported the Minute of dissent arguing that the term 'tested banking experience' was too vague to be included in the Act. He observed that 'experience as a joint-stock banker, whose outlook has been cribbed, cabined and confined by the narrowness of profit earning pursuits cannot always secure that breadth of vision and that appreciation of broader national interest that are essential in the head of a central banking institution.'[17] He moved an amendment to delete the clause which was adopted by a large majority.

The Legislature also rejected the negative provision for excluding members of the civil service from holding the position of Governor or Deputy Governor. The most stinging attack against civil servants came from Sir Cowasji Jehangir, who was opposed to government servants heading the bank unless they had been out of government for at least five years, 'out of Government office, out of this red-tapism, out of the groove into which they get, out of that system which makes their visions narrow, which clouds their horizon.'[18] However, the rejection of this clause was only to be expected given the fact that James Taylor who was in charge of drafting of the Bill was a civil servant and there was anxiety that he should not be precluded
