suitable Deputy Governor could not be found, Taylor brought in P.S. Beale of the Bank of England as Secretary of the bank to assist him.

However, the matter of a replacement for Taylor, should he fall ill or take leave, continued to receive the attention of the government and the India Office. As a short-term solution, a liaison officer was suggested who would keep the government in touch with the bank's working by being on the Board and also attending committee meetings. As regards taking Taylor's place in case of an emergency it was thought that a senior officer of the Imperial Bank would be a suitable choice if Taylor was suddenly and permanently incapacitated. The liaison officer selected was C.D. Deshmukh who was nominated as the government Director on the Board in July 1939, and a few months later in October, became Secretary of the bank. Deshmukh went on to become Deputy Governor (in 1941) and the first Indian Governor of the RBI in August 1943. The story of his entry into the bank and his rise to the Governorship is told in Chapter 17.
