resolution urging steps for a lower ratio. The government responded with a communiqué disputing some of the facts put forward by the Congress Working Committee. In January 1939, Purshotamdas brought the matter up once again before the Central Board who resolved (8:5) that the government should consider a lower ratio. Nothing came of it and the agitation lost steam as the rate steadied. It ultimately died down with the onset of the Second World War. In fact the higher rate proved to be a blessing in disguise as it accumulated higher sterling balances in London. The matter of the sterling balances is discussed in some detail in Chapter 21.
