settled to India's satisfaction, India should have nothing to do with international organizations. The total commitments were in the region of ₹266 crores, and if the Bank ran into bad debts while lending to countries whose economies were shattered by war, India's hard-won foreign resources would be lost.[39]

SAVANNAH AND AFTER

The Indian delegation headed by Deshmukh left India on March 1, 1946. It comprised J.V. Joshi, the Reserve Bank's Economic Adviser who was to be nominated Executive Director for India on the Fund and H.D. Cayley, Deputy Controller of Exchange in the Bank. Joshi was one of Keynes's most brilliant pupils at King's College, Cambridge, and it would have pleased him no end that he was nominated as India's Executive Director on the Fund. Inclement weather and limited plane service delayed the delegation and the government instructed Sir A. Ramaswami Mudaliar who was in Washington at the time to act as temporary Alternate Governor till Deshmukh arrived. Deshmukh arrived on March 12, his long and weary journey made worse by hypertension which took some time to come down.

As we have noted before, since the USSR did not sign the Agreements before December 31, 1945, India became the fifth largest quota country and was entitled to appoint an Executive Director on the Boards of the Fund and the Bank. At the meeting of the Membership Committee held on March 12, Sir Ramaswami sought clarification on what would happen to India's appointed executive Director if USSR joined the Fund since USSR had a larger quota than India. Keynes supported the proposal of the Indian delegation that this particular matter should be referred to an Ad Hoc Committee of which Keynes was the Chairman. This Committee proposed that there would be one additional Executive Director, who would hold office until the second election, if at any time before the second election both of the following conditions exist: 1)There have been admitted to membership the Governments of one or more countries not listed in Schedule A; and 2) The members not entitled to appoint Executive Directors, whose votes are not included in those entitled to be cast by Executive Directors holding office at the time the Additional Director is elected, have votes totaling 4,000.
