This report and resolution was approved and adopted by the Board of Governors at the fifth session on March 15, 1946. Deshmukh publicly acknowledged the valuable assistance and guidance rendered by Keynes in this matter. Keynes also expressed his wholehearted support for the provision in the Fund's Articles, sponsored by the Indian delegation, that in appointing the staff the Managing Director would, subject to securing the highest standards of efficiency and technical competence, pay due regard to the importance of recruiting personnel on as wide a geographical basis as possible. Deshmukh observes that the Savannah meeting 'remains memorable mainly as the occasion when the Indian delegation worked in effortless accord with the British delegation under Lord Keynes and there were many occasions when there happened to be agreement between us on the need to take some step which would increase the utility, independence and creativity of the international bodies.'[40]

One such matter was the Indian delegation's support of Keynes's proposal to locate the Fund and the Bank in New York rather than in Washington. Later, India, together with France and Canada, withdrew their objections in order to make the report unanimous. Deshmukh observed, 'Lord Keynes and I felt at least the latter would be better suited in New York, which was the commercial capital of the United States and already possessed a vast and alert organization of credit and trade facilities. It was ultimately decided to have the central offices in Washington, but the fact that we, on the threshold of national independence, could and did take an independent line on such questions was warmly appreciated, particularly by Lord Keynes personally.'[41]

Keynes found Deshmukh, as told to him earlier by Raisman, to be 'loyal' and 'a good civil servant'. Ironically, Chetty whom Grigg had described as political and ambitious, was regarded by Keynes as 'very amenable and sensible'.[42] Keynes at the end of the farewell banquet remarked, prophetically, to Deshmukh: 'I hope you will have great influence for good in your country.'[43] Towards the end, Keynes paid a glowing tribute to the Indian delegation. 'The excellence and closeness of our relations with the Indian Delegation deserves special comment. Sir Chintaman Deshmukh handled his case with high dignity, ability, and reasonableness: we always supported him on his interests and he always supported us on ours'.[44] No other delegation evoked such sincere praise from Keynes.[45]
