distinct was designed to ensure a unified command of branch operations, a strong machinery to undertake planning, and promotional work and the ability to manage 450–500 offices. Two Deputy Secretary and Treasurers were to be entrusted with this work, designated Deputy Secretary (Planning and Staff) and Deputy Secretary (Operations). The Secretary and Treasurer was to oversee their work. The accounts department of the LHO was separated from the administrative wing of the LHO by creating a separate branch known as the main branch headed by a senior officer.

Control and direction of large branches was given to the Deputy Secretary (Operations) and the other branches grouped geographically formed part of a region (comprising about 75 branches) which was under the control of a Regional Manager (RM). RMs were to operate from the LHO and report to the Deputy Secretary (Operations). The post of District Superintendent was to be abolished and a new post introduced to provide unity of command with branch agents reporting to the RM for the entire functioning of the branch. This was to replace the multiple control to which agents were subjected to in the past. Each RM was assisted by three Area Superintendents so as to maintain contact with the offices under his control. ‘The position of the area superintendent was created to help reduce the ‘remoteness’ of the branches from the controlling authorities, and in the long run to develop branch managers into better decision-makers.’[6] In addition, Development Managers, functional specialists who reported to the Deputy Secretary (P&S) were designated to appraise policies, procedures, and marketing strategies for each market segment so as to achieve wider customer coverage in each segment.

Changes were also suggested at the level of the central office. Three posts of Deputy Managing Director were created with responsibilities for planning and research, banking operations, and staff and services. The Managing Director was to coordinate their functions. This was done so that the Chairman and Managing Director would be free to plan for growth and focus on policy matters instead of getting bogged down in matters of operational routine.

The consultants distinguished between three kinds of tasks central to the organization: entrepreneurial tasks which were best performed by the Board of Directors; directional tasks which were to be the responsibility of top management; and operational tasks to be undertaken by the senior and
