The Bombay Plan can also be seen as part of the belief of the importance the industrialists thought would be due them, and the role they expected to play. Their hopes were belied after independence when a series of inquiries were instituted against big business houses to probe war profiteering. The adoption of a socialistic pattern only added to their insecurity. When the Second Five Year Plan showed below par results, Shroff became a bitter critic of planning the way it was being implemented by the government. He realised that government itself had become a bottleneck.

Shroff also headed the Railway Supplies' Enquiry Committee which was set up in 1950 to suggest measures to deal with the chaotic situation with regard to railway stores. Shroff recommended that a centralized stores' organization be created to control railway stores with an individual of the rank of Member of the Railway Board at its head. Today, the Indian Railways has an Indian Railway Stores Service, but no officer of the rank of a Member at its head. The member in charge is Member (Mechanical), Railway Board.

At his peak Shroff was the Chairman or Director of over fifty companies but the Bank of India and the New India Assurance Company were his first love. In 1950 he became a Director of the Bank of India, and when Sir Cowasji Jehangir stepped down in 1959 as Chairman due to ill health, Shroff stepped into his shoes. He remained the Chairman till his death in 1965, and was concerned with issues such as image, reach, and customer interaction long before these became fashionable in banking circles. He was also responsible for launching the five-pronged star of the bank in 1962. He said the five points symbolised the bank's presence in the five continents and the elongated top prong indicated the bank's constant endeavour to achieve higher goals. An important focus for Shroff was branch expansion. The Bank of India nearly doubled its branches in 1960–65. Deposits and advances also doubled, and profit rose by 50 percent. He also played a major role in promoting the Indian Banks' Association of which he was the Chairman at the time of his death, helping it grow to become the voice of the banking industry. In 1956, Shroff helped promote the India Reinsurance Corporation Ltd, and became its first Chairman. The idea was to develop expertise in a field which hitherto was based almost entirely in London.

In 1954, the Congress accepted the Avadi Resolution for a socialistic pattern of growth. In the next few years anti-private sector feeling ran high
