Bhushan. His alma mater, the London School of Economics, conferred on him an Honorary Fellowship.

In Parekh's last years, developments in the financial sector brought him some measure of satisfaction. N. Vaghul observed: 'The most gratifying aspect about his life is that values he cherished all his life, came into reality in the last years…opening up the financial sector, and deregulation of lending rates were issues he stood for all his life, and this happened before he passed away.'[11]

Parekh passed away on November 18, 1994, and his death marked the end of a lifespan synonymous with the growth and development of the Indian financial sector. To mould one stellar institution might be an accident (though it certainly was not in Parekh's case), but to do it twice suggests a competence that is indeed rare. As R.M. Lala aptly put it: 'Devout Hindus believe in thousands of rebirths but for Hasmukhbhai this may be his last visit. The soul of a man who made homes available to so many will surely find shelter in a far more beautiful place.'[12]
