Sorabji learned to play the violin and even gave some violin tuitions to supplement the family's income. He had a love for reading and later also writing poetry. In adult life his only real hobby was his love of the Indian stage. He wrote three plays, two of which Khushro Shirin and Yezdezard Sheriar were produced successfully. Sorabji used his financial acumen to help Madan Theatres in 1924 when it was facing financial difficulties. He analyzed the company's problems and submitted a proposal for reorganization which ultimately saved the company. Hirjibhoy, who remained a bachelor all his life, got his brothers and sisters married and it was only fitting that he received the love and respect due to a father. Sorabji, it is said, never left the house without bidding him goodbye.

Sorabji's uncle too had risen to the post of a head clerk in the same bank, a status and privilege rarely accorded to an Indian. The uncle had used his good offices in getting Hirjibhoy into the Bank, and in turn Hirjibhoy arranged a clerkship of ₹20 per month for Sorabji.[7] Sorabji had passed his matriculation examination at the age of sixteen and had joined St Xavier's College but had failed in his examination of 'Previous'. It is likely that this was the point when 'he had the first intimation of his own impatience with academic theory and his penchant for pragmatic action.'[8] It is possible that for a man of his temperament, working and learning were inseparable from the other and this was reflected in his impatience with academic theory.

With his brother as the book-keeper and uncle as the head clerk, Sorabji learnt as much of the working of the bank as he could. He was not content to only master his job but also made it his business to learn as much as he could of every branch of the bank's activity. He unofficially moved from department to department and learnt the fundamentals of how the entire bank functioned. Sorabji was already displaying some of the qualities which were to make him the pioneer he eventually became, even though it may not have been evident to others immediately, or to Sorabji himself, who felt within himself the stirrings of something that went well beyond ordinary ambition. Sorabji was challenging the prevailing structure which convention and the ethos of the times had caused to be unquestioningly accepted by the others. In fact nothing was further from the minds of the foreign management than the training of Indian clerks. The prevailing prejudice against the Indians ensured that there was no possibility of being promoted as an officer regardless of merit. Sorabji's brother was a head
