conversation and Lalchand was struck by Sorabji's positive outlook and friendly disposition. He also gained enough knowledge as to Sorabji's circumstances and his burning desire to better them. Shrewdly assessing his potential, Lalchand offered Sorabji a job. Sorabji accepted the offer and resigned from the Bank of India. When Sorabji broke the news to his family there was consternation and every attempt was made to dissuade him from accepting the offer and withdraw his resignation, since his family was united in the belief that as a rolling stone, Sorabji would gather no moss. Hirjibhoy and his mother implored him to remain at the bank and in the end Sorabji relented. He was thus prevented from abandoning his fledgling banking career, a happy event as it turned out, for both Sorabji and the world of banking. It is to Sorabji's pioneering efforts that we now turn.
