A man who had the vision to launch a bank in the face of stiff opposition was hardly likely to lack in innovativeness. The distribution of Small Savings Safes to thousands of homes in Rangoon, in a population not given to thrift, was an innovation which brought home the presence of the Central Bank to the people of Burma. The bank was also the first Indian bank to issue Three Year Cash Certificates carrying attractive rates of interest on the lines of the Postal Cash Certificates. It was part of the Central Bank's policy to create and cultivate a market, and to this end in 1917 it launched a scheme to enable people of limited resources to subscribe to War Loans in easy monthly installments. This generated a lot of goodwill and also made good business sense. In 1935, the number of accounts in Bombay rose to 69,000 out of a population of 11.61 lakhs—a ratio of an account for every seventeen citizens. Sorabji was concerned primarily with the diffusion of the banking habit and much of the bank's dividends were derived from this and not from spectacular deals or hazardous investments. Sorabji observed in July 1924: 'The Central Bank has always believed in a policy, conciliatory though firm, conservative but always open to well-weighed changes.'[2]

According to Sorabji, the policy of the bank had all along been to avoid devoting itself to any particular or exclusive line of business, and its chief aim had been to accommodate all kinds of businesses and all classes of businessmen. 'It has been the considered opinion of the Central Bank that a bank stands for nothing if it restricts itself to earning profits for its shareholders only and does not do its duty to the public and trade. From the very beginning, it has been the policy of the Central Bank to render good service to its clients, and as a national institution, it has always safeguarded their interests with scrupulous zeal.'[3] Sorabji believed that the bank's first duty was to its depositors rather than its shareholders since the bank was acting as a trustee of public money and was responsible for its right use and safe investment.

The Central Bank was also the first bank to introduce gold bars minted in its own name as also silver bars of 2–10 kilos each. In 1925, keeping in mind the persons of small means, the bank started selling gold bars weighing 5 and 10 tolas. They were guaranteed pure by the mint's seal and were popular with the middle class.
