set up on the basis of Sorabji's recommendations as the Chairman of the Royal Banking Commission of Ceylon. Training is now conducted at the bank's main training college fittingly named in honour of its founder: Sorabji Pochkhanawala Bankers Training College in Mumbai, and in the bank's eleven training centres around the country.

In a memorandum on what he expected from young people who had adopted banking as a career, Sorabji enumerated some of the personal characteristics which he valued above all else: agreeable presence, accommodating disposition, mental alertness, orderliness, tact, determination, independent judgment, and character.[11] In a speech, he exhorted his staff to extend all consideration to the customers and treat their business dealings as strictly confidential.

Always placing the customer first, Sorabji observed: 'Efforts are never to cease to convert a dissatisfied customer into a satisfied one. Every member of our staff is under an obligation to be courteous and render all possible help to our constituents. It has always been my exhortation to the officers and other members of my staff to extend all consideration to the customers consistent with the safety and progress of the Bank and to treat their business dealings as strictly confidential.'[12]

Sorabji was also very practical in his approach and did not stand on ceremony. When the Calcutta branch was being opened in 1916, the Chief Cashier and his staff failed to turn up. An unruffled Sorabji took on most of the work and had everything under control before the inauguration.

Another incident, which is now a part of the folklore of the Central Bank, involves Sorabji who while walking up the corridor in the bank, heard a clerk berating a peon for his failure to bring a particular ledger. Sorabji, it is said, went to the appropriate shelf and put the ledger on the clerk's desk much to the latter's surprise and discomfiture. But Sorabji never lost the human touch in his dealings with his staff. When he had to dismiss an old and trusted employee for theft, he found a job for his brother-in-law. The loyalty that Sorabji obtained from every level of his employees stemmed from his gentle and sweet dealings and from the fact that even in the worst case of inefficiency or negligence, Sorabji was never unduly harsh. He was also eager to help, and assistance both institutional and personal, was easily given when sought by those in need of it.
