Finally, the Board questioned the propriety of Sorabji having received ₹20,000 from Messrs Fatehchand Rawaldas as his share of the commission received by the firm from the bank for underwriting its shares. Nanporia observes that Sorabji's receipt of the commission was no secret; in fact it was an established practice of the time. In any case if this was such an 'incontrovertible irregularity', it is difficult to understand why the matter was dropped. He maintains, 'it was not by common acceptance an irregularity can be gathered from the decision to let the matter drop, giving rise to the question as to why it was ever raised.'[8] Sir Phiroze Sethna's comment 'if he has done well for himself he has done better for the Bank'[9] puts things in their proper perspective but the fact that his remuneration was commented upon is indicative of the deep resentment against Sorabji and the supercharged atmosphere in the bank.

Nanporia refers to an incident in which Sir Dinshaw had referred to Sorabji in very disparaging terms in the presence of two of his subordinates and had threatened to resign and make 'exposures' thereby casting a slur on Sorabji's integrity. Considering the trials he had faced to set up the Central Bank, there could not have been a more improbable target for the 'accusation of a lack of probity'[10]. By its nature a board is institutionally inclined and Sir Phiroze, who played the role of mediator, must have realized that it was probably Sorabji's ebullience that made it difficult 'to digest him into the orthodoxy of an institution.'[11] He wrote to Sir Dinshaw that he (Sir Dinshaw) had got 'unnecessarily carried away'[12] and owed Sorabji an explanation. Sir Dinshaw explained that his exposures had reference to his opinion as to the methods the Indian Merchants' Chamber was employing to get a 1s 4d ratio instead of 1s 6d and he would expose this in a dissenting note to the bank's reply to the government on the Currency Bill. What Sorabji and others thought of this peculiar explanation is not known but 'it had the merit of clarifying any aspersions on Sorabji's integrity.'

Conditions during the period 1925–27 were not the most propitious for the Central Bank. There had been a run in Bombay fuelled by wild rumours and ₹2 lakhs were lost due to fraud at the Bora Bazaar branch. A subcommittee appointed at the instance of Homi Mody to look into the bank's financial condition, however, revealed a substantial increase in income due to the reorganization of some branches. Masani's efforts had
