borne fruit but the report also showed certain irregularities in working. Large amounts of unrealized appreciation had been taken to the Profit and Loss Account and towards the provision of bad and doubtful debts without the knowledge or consent of the Board. Sir Dinshaw was infuriated enough to draw up a statement of how much the bank would save if they replaced Sorabji with two lesser paid employees. According to Karanjia, it was Masani who prevailed upon Sir Dinshaw to drop the matter.

But matters would become much worse. Sorabji was understandably hurt when in October 1928 the Board of Directors passed a resolution commending the work done by Masani. In seventeen years he had never had such a resolution passed in his favour. In the same month, the Board reallocated managerial duties between Masani and Sorabji. Masani in addition to supervising the branches would also exercise general supervision over the work of different departments in the head-office. In case he found it necessary to give instructions to the head office staff, he would do so in consultation with Sorabji. The fat was now truly in the fire. Sorabji now regarded Masani as his sworn enemy. Still, if Karanjia is to be believed, Masani made every attempt at least in the initial stages to act as peacemaker between Sorabji and the Board. And when the fear was expressed that Sorabji may not resume work on his return, or might even start a rival bank, it was Masani who along with a mutual friend interceded and induced Sorabji to resume work.

Masani also showed admirable restraint when Sorabji objected to sharing his office with him. But what triggered Masani’s turning into an implacable foe was Sorabji’s charge that Masani was able to show larger profits because he had not maintained as liquid a cash position as he should have, and that the deposits had reduced. Masani said that the position was as liquid as safety demanded and that the deposits had come down because of his policy not to take deposits at uneconomic rates. By now relations had greatly deteriorated between the two and Masani in a letter complained to the Board about the hostility he faced from Sorabji. In fact the original draft of the letter contained his resignation, but he was persuaded to drop this by Sir Phiroze, who promised to look into the matter.

Sir Dinshaw carried on a correspondence with Masani for many years. A perusal of some of those letters reveals that Sir Dinshaw had voiced the suspicion that the Chairman, Sir Phiroze Sethna, and Sorabji were in
