their time in India was up. They were aware that the uneasy hold on India of the four years of the First World War was slipping out of their hands. They were also aware that the Muslims and Hindus of Punjab were coming together to protest against the economic and political hardships of the time that continued unabated well after the Great War. The response of the Raj was to pass the Rowlatt Act in February 1919, through the legislature of the Imperial Legislative Council, which made it possible for the courts to try political cases in the absence of a jury and allowed the internment of suspects without trial, in much the same way as the Guantanamo Bay has functioned today in Cuba under American control in the ill-fated ‘War on Terror’.
