commitment to guaranteeing employment, such that almost every third world country had intellectuals rushing to embrace it in the rise to an international movement for socialism. Bhagat Singh was one such person. In fact, in just under half a century, over a third of humanity fell under socialist rule. The Great Depression of the 1930s left it largely unaffected, even though the Soviet Union was still less than two decades old, as it raced forward in industrial production at astronomic speed while also ensuring that agricultural production was not left behind. Hunger became a thing of the past. A universal right to education was established even at secondary level. Healthcare was available to all. In fact, Russia became the first country to send a man into outer space. Soviet athletes easily competed with the best from the advanced capitalist economies of the West with distinctive success. We have forgotten today how it was that by the 1960s the Soviet Union was doing better by most human development indices than their Western capitalist counterparts. Today, we know only of Putin's Russia. A Russia that wages war with the intensity of ferocious medieval barbarity in the Ukraine. A Russia which makes it possible in March 2022 for the Washington Post to write of how, 'Russia's invasion of Ukraine is a seismic event, perhaps the most significant one in international life since the fall of the Berlin Wall . . . This war marks the end of an age.'[3] But it is as well to remember that there was another Russian age. One that inspired the developing world.

Those who lived through that earlier period, however, only remember too well that in those heady days long before the fall of the Iron Curtain in 1991, it had indeed seemed that a wide-ranging European Revolution would follow hot on the heels of the October Revolution. It was for this reason that in the 1920s and 1930s, as Kama Maclean notes, '[t]he revolutionaries of the HSRA were motivated by socialist ideologies and methodologies of dissent in Russia and Ireland; they aspired to free India from foreign domination as the first step towards the larger goal of creating an equitable society. As such they were deeply engaged in the nationalist enterprise even as they embraced different strategies and have their eye on a larger goal'.[4]
