stands there named after him as ‘Khudiram Bose Central Jail’. If only the Lahore Central Jail had not been demolished in the mid 1960s, it would have been possible to do the same today. It would certainly have avoided all the legal wrangles that currently engulf ‘Bhagat Singh Chowk’ at Shadman Chowk in Lahore.

Yet, the narrative of India’s freedom struggle is skewed. To find a reason for this, one needs to go to the origins of the Indian Independence struggle. This is when, as Kama Maclean makes clear, the ‘[n]arratives of the Indian freedom struggle had been predominantly framed as a triumph for the Gandhian ideology of non- violence’, and yet, as she points out, ‘there is much evidence to suggest that the interwar years were marked by urgent discussions questioning its viability’.[9] In fact, by the early 1920s, ‘it was not clear whether Gandhi would continue to command nationalist action, or even be in a position to continue to steer the Indian National Congress within non-violent parameters’.[10] Following 1909, after he had written Hind Swaraj, ‘much of Gandhi’s thinking about nonviolence was framed as a dialogue with activists who favoured violence as a means of political redress for the oppression of colonialism’. The result was that, ‘by the early 1920s, Gandhi had withdrawn from agitational politics, dismayed and disillusioned by the violent outbreaks that attended the Non-Cooperation Movement’.[11] Indeed by February 1922, he had called off his non-cooperation movement completely. This is why, referring to Judith Brown, Kama Maclean emphasizes, ‘[t]he degree to which Gandhi struggled to gain acceptance of nonviolence as Congress policy’.[12] And yet, it remains the case to this day that ‘[h]istorians have generally accounted
