thousands of his countrymen would drive “Your dirty dogs out of my country”’ and that ‘[a]fter the death sentence had been passed upon him, Singh raised his right arm and shouted “Imrah” [“rebel”] three times. He also spat upon the table below the Judge’.[24] In Udham Singh’s trial it is said that the words used by Udham Singh when he addressed the court and which were interrupted by the Judge included a ‘few lines [which] consist of a poem in Urdu, which is signed “Bawa”, this being the name by which he was commonly known to his associates’. However, there then ‘followed a stanza of a Gurmukhi [Punjabi script used by Sikhs] poem on Indian martyrs. The words “Bhagat Singh”, “Dutt”, “Tilak” and “Lajpat”, all well known figures in the national struggle, appear in this poem’.[25] In this document, which is dated 20 June 1940, and stamped in bold capital letters with the word ‘SECRET’ in the top left-hand corner,[26] it is said, ‘I am sending you herewith a copy of a note prepared in this office, giving the substance of the papers which UDHAM SINGH brought into court with him on the day when he was sentenced to death. These papers consisted of four sheets in the English, Gurmukhi and Urdu hand-writing of the accused. I do not think that there is anything in them which indicates outside influence: the sentiments expressed are typical of the half-educated Ghadr revolutionary, and the writing appears to have covered a period of several weeks’.[27] Half-educated or not, it is clear that Bhagat Singh, together with other revolutionaries of the day, was a major influence on Udham Singh.

In his majestic Amritsar 1919, Kim Wagner ends with the observation that, along with Udham Singh who avenged the Jallianwala Bagh Massacre, Bhagat Singh ‘is Punjab’s most celebrated hero’ today. Much folklore has grown around these two men. Fact and fiction merge into one. He observes how ‘[i]t is said that Udham Singh had himself been present at the Jallianwalla Bagh and was wounded in the arm, although there is little evidence of this’.[28] What is not in doubt is that Udham Singh himself ‘was deeply influenced by the activities of Bhagat Singh’ and that ‘in 1935, when he was on a visit to Kashmir, he was found carrying Bhagat Singh’s portrait’ and that ‘he invariably referred to him as his guru . . .’.[29] In fact, there exist notes where he refers to Bhagat Singh and others who fought for
