paro, inke pher mein paroge to "Phansi" par lataq jayonge / Aur qaam kuch bhi nahin kar payoge'). But Bhagat Singh paid no heed. Sachindra Nath Sanyal was a Bengali, as was his close associate Rash Behari Bose, who was later to flee to Japan, but as Sanyal proudly recalled many years later, 'In spite of the best efforts of Gurmukh Singh, Bhagat Singh never dissociated himself from us.'[14] If Sanyal had been found sitting in Professor Jaichandra Vidyalankar's house for the purposes of affecting an introduction with Bhagat Singh, this too was not to be unexpected. Born in 1893, Vidyalankar was a veteran of revolutionary activities, having participated in the Kakori train robbery, and had not once but twice suffered deportation to the Andaman Islands from 1915 to 1919. He died before Independence in 1943. In his autobiography, he explains how in meetings with the students of the Tilak School of Politics he 'had long talks with these young men separately'. He added, 'I particularly emphasised before them that India could not become independent except through armed struggle' and that is why 'I initiated them in the revolutionary path'.[15]
