in a coloured felt cap and warm coat over his khaki shorts and in a black pair of shoes, ran towards him and fired another seven bullets into him.[6]

The two assassins were then seen to make off. They headed in the opposite direction of the police station into DAV College through its gate. The head constable gave chase. A traffic inspector, Mr Fearn, also joined in. Without warning, one of the men, Chandrashekhar Azad, in an almond-coloured turban, a loose salwar and wearing a pair of running shoes, turned around and fired. His bullet hit Chanan Singh, who fell mortally wounded.[7] The next day, on 18 December 1928, the assassins realized that Saunders was not Scott. They altered their pre-prepared posters to substitute the name of Scott with Saunders', and posted them all over Lahore, with the heading, 'Saunders is dead. Lalaji is avenged'. Interestingly, while the text of the posters explained why the assassination had to be carried out they also added, 'Sorry for the death of the man. But in this man had died the representative of an institution which is so cruel, lowly and so base that it must be abolished.'[8] They also declared that, 'We are sorry to admit that we who attach so great a sanctity to human life, who dream of a glorious future, when man will be enjoying perfect peace and full liberty, have been forced to shed human blood.' These are astonishing words that would rarely have been uttered before in the annals of revolutionary movement and especially in the very heat of the moment of performing the revolutionary act in question. Yet, they are illuminating in every way. They are a resounding rejection of violence in every form.

It was then time to make oneself scarce. For the first time in his life, Bhagat Singh cut his long hair as a Sikh, removed his much-cherished pagri (turban) and donned a hat. Disguising himself as a wealthy sahib or an Anglo-Indian and accompanied by Durga Bhabhi[9] (one of the few women revolutionaries who actually participated in armed revolution against the British), he made haste in the middle of the night to escape for Lahore Railway Station, from where he took a train for Calcutta. The HSRA dispersed, only to regroup in Agra. There they set up a bomb factory. Plans were made on how to take further 'Actions'. New plots were hatched. One