went on to become national heroes because of ‘their practice of hunger strikes and non-violence civil disobedience within the walls of Lahore’s prisons in 1929-30’, as Neeti Nair has explained and, ‘the quality of anti-colonial nationalism represented by Bhagat Singh was central to the resolution of many of the divisions that racked pre-partition Punjab’.[34] Yet, today we have a situation in India and Pakistan where, if anything, those divisions are even more pronounced, and ‘[t]he revolutionaries of the HSRA have long been marginalised in the academic history or geography of nationalism,’ as Kama Maclean tells us. This is ‘despite their extraordinary popularity in popular culture’ and ‘in colonial India, this was most evident in prescribed literature and posters, and in contemporary India, in film, posters, comics and bazaar histories’.[35]
