6 June 1929 Statement

If Bhagat Singh's anti-colonialism eschewed communal divisions, it is because he fused myriad sources of inspiration, sometimes Marxist and sometimes anarchist. This is why he is an enigma. The freedom movement of the 1920s of pre-Partition India was plagued by communal divisions. Post-Partition too, the tensions between Hindus and Muslims or Indians and Pakistanis have shown no signs of subsiding. In many ways, they are exacerbated today. So, Bhagat Singh is a puzzle, a paradox of the Indian subcontinent, and different from leaders who represented specific vote banks and communal interests. Bhagat Singh did not represent any sectional interests. For this reason he places these leaders in a quandary because it was not communities he championed but causes. Pre-eminent amongst these were the causes of the poor, the dispossessed and the marginalized. His throwing of two bombs in the Central Legislative Assembly was intended to disrupt the passage of the Public Safety and Trade Disputes Bill, so that assembly members would not be able to vote on a bill designed to circumscribe the rights of Indian workers. It was not accordingly an act of anarchism pure and simple. But there was a second purpose which made the act even further removed from anarchism. It was to expose what purported to be an Indian Parliament, in the form of the Central Legislative Assembly, as nothing more than a vassal of the Imperial Parliament in London.

The bomb throwing was an act of censure. As such, both acts were more aligned to the socialist cause that Bhagat Singh and the HSRA espoused than to anarchism. The pamphlets thrown into the assembly made it only too clear that Bhagat Singh's political philosophy did not allow him to endorse violence because of 'our love for humanity' bearing 'no personal
