Safety Bills snuff out the flames of freedom in India?'.[3] He is clear that laws such as the Public Safety and Trade Disputes Bill, which was presented before the Central Legislative Assembly, cannot achieve this aim. He is clear that fraudulent and fabricated charges against the young who are hauled up before the courts in their ever-expanding numbers will not vanquish them. The truth is that when it comes to it, 'conspiracy cases, trumped up or discovered and the incarceration of all young men, who cherish the vision of a great ideal, cannot check the march of revolution'. With a thundering and prophetic claim he asserts how in these circumstances, 'we took it upon ourselves to provide this warning and our duty is done'.[4]

Bhagat Singh and B.K. Dutt do not just chide 'the heedless' to give them 'a timely warning' that underneath 'the seeming stillness of the sea of Indian humanity' there is about to be 'a veritable storm', which is why they have 'to warn those who are speeding along without heeding the grave dangers ahead'. They also make it clear that if India's present predicament is left unaddressed, it is 'bound to lead to chaos'. They have no doubt that 'this state of affairs cannot last long' given that 'the present order of society in merry-making is on the brink of a volcano'.[5] To ensure that their warning was heeded, Bhagat Singh and B.K. Dutt now wanted 'to make the deaf hear'. In fact, these actions were not just those of Bhagat Singh and B.K. Dutt alone. They were an emulation of the actions of the French anarchist, Auguste Vaillant, who had launched a similar bomb attack on the French Chamber of Deputies on 9 December 1893. Like Bhagat Singh, he had also thrown a home-made device from the public gallery. And like Bhagat Singh, he too was immediately arrested. Indeed, Vaillant's device was also a weak one. It also only caused slight injuries in the chamber. He also had said that his aim was to 'make the deaf hear', but not to kill anyone, in revenge for the state execution the previous year of a fellow anarchist, Ravachol. Vaillant was put to death and faced the guillotine on 5 February 1894.[6] His actions inspired a number of anarchists after him, one of whom was Bhagat Singh. Like Vaillant, whose last words were 'Death to the Bourgeoisie! Long live Anarchy!', Bhagat Singh used the slogan 'Inquilab