the prosecution (known as ‘approvers’) so that eighteen were present in court. Carden Noad read their names out in court in the following order:

1. Sukhdev, alias Dayal, alias Swami, alias villager;
2. Kishori Lal Rattan, alias Dee Dutt Rattan, alias Mast Ram Shastri;
3. Des Raj;
4. Prem Dutt, alias Master, alias Amrit Lal;
5. Jai Dev, alias Harish Chander;
6. Sheo Verma, alias Parbhat, alias Hamarain, alias Ram Narain Kapur;
7. Gya Prashad, alias Dr. B.S. Nigham, alias Ram Lal, alias Ram Nath, alias Desh Bhagat;
8. Mahabir Singh, alias Partab;
9. Bhagat Singh; who had the most aliases, including ‘Balraj’ as ‘Chief of the Hindustan Republican Army’.
10. Ajoy Kumar Ghosh, alias Negro General;
11. Jatin Sanyal (Jatinder Nath Sanyal);
12. Bejoy Kumar Sinha, alias Bachu;
13. Shivram Rajguru, alias ‘M’;
14. Kundan Lal, alias Partap, alias No. 1;
15. Kanwalk Nath Trivedi, alias Kanwal Nath Tewari.

Notwithstanding Rajmohan Gandhi’s views, the fact remains that, as the Hindustan Times recorded, ‘Bhagat Singh remains the most iconic – and beloved – martyr in the collective consciousness of India.’[3] There is surely a reason for this. After the Jallianwala Bagh Massacre, the non-cooperation movement started in 1920 spearheaded by Mahatma Gandhi. Bhagat Singh left the DAV School in Lahore. He joined the National College. It was there that he met with his fellow revolutionary friends, Bhagwati Charan Vohra, Sukhdev and Yashpal, becoming an avid reader, with a keen interest in the history of revolutions, but having to abandon college at the age of seventeen in 1924. He gave up his undergraduate studies, left Lahore and made haste for Kanpur. His grandmother and father had decided it was time for him to marry. Bhagat Singh was not one for marrying, however. His nuptials were with India’s freedom struggle. That is how he would live. And that is how he would perish.