B.K. Dutt were required to be shackled on both hands at the gate of the jail as they came out of their cells on their way to the courtroom, which was opposite the jail. It was not clear whether there was an order from the magistrate Rai Sahib Pandit Sri Kishen or whether this was at the behest of the jail superintendent. They resisted. They had every reason to. All the accused had openly dissociated themselves from the unsavoury actions of the juvenile Prem Dutt Verma. They saw it as an impulsive action on his part and they expressed regret at what he had been driven to do upon sight of Jai Gopal.

Those in Borstal Jail were now required to be handcuffed on both hands before coming to court. They too resisted. When they were brought to the porch of Borstal Institute, handcuffs were forcibly put on them, and six of them were then thrown in the back of the lorry, which then sped off to drop them off at the gates of the central jail. Upon arrival there, the accused refused to disembark from the lorry. The press was present at the gate of the jail. The accused told them that they had been beaten, caned and physically mistreated. Many had sustained injuries. The proceedings could not continue, so they were adjourned. When they resumed there was now a lot of bad blood between the authorities and the accused.

All the accused had to return to the courtroom with handcuffs on both hands. As they were resisting, they had to be dragged into the courtroom and flung into the dock. Shiv Verma and Ajoy Ghosh were both rendered unconscious. Bhagat Singh and B.K. Dutt remained lucid, but in great pain. As they entered the courtroom, they were disoriented[4] and they spluttered and choked. Their shrill cries of ‘Long live the revolution’,‘Long live the Proletariat’ and ‘Down with imperialism’, nevertheless, rang out. Bhagat Singh immediately demanded of the magistrate whether it was he who had ordered that the accused be kicked by the police. He wanted to know why the police were not under his control. Others shouted ‘Shame! Shame!’ to the magistrate after Bhagat Singh demanded answers. The magistrate feebly ventured to ask who it was that had kicked them. Bhagat pointed them out at once with the words that several officers had sat on them and kicked them on various parts of their body. B.K. Dutt pointed out that he received
