in which he said that Bhagat Singh's life 'cannot be studied except in motion'.[2] Had Bhagat Singh survived the tumultuous years of the 1920s and 1930s, which led to Independence, today 'he would have become a Marxist Gandhian'.[3] Subsequently, when Moffat, interviewed him in 2012, Chandra confirmed that he saw Bhagat Singh as 'a terrorist in the unmaking' and a 'Marxist in the making'.[4] Yet, as Moffat points out, 'we cannot know what Bhagat Singh would have become had he lived'[5] and that this is so even when it is borne in mind 'that HSRA members like Ghosh and Varma – not to mention Kishori Lal, B.K. Sinha and Jaidev Kapur – all joined the CPI',[6] referring to how they all flocked to the Communist Party of India ('CPI') as their natural home after Independence.

Moffat uses the 'metaphor of a journey' and the idea of 'Bhagat Singh in motion' to describe how, at first Bhagat Singh steadily moves in a way that 'tracks a departure from violence, liberating the revolutionary from the stigma of "terrorist" action',[7] but then secondly in so doing manages an 'arrival at something refined, comprehensive, stable' so that 'for some it is most certainly Marxist, for others anarchist' while for some others 'it is simply a more perfect patriotism'.[8] Instances of the former, according to Moffat, are his sessions court statement in Delhi, where initially in 1929 he doggedly maintains how revolution 'does not necessarily involve a sanguinary strife, nor is there any place in it for individual vendetta' since 'it is not the cult of the bomb or the pistol'. From this, it is said that he journeys by 1931 to a position whereby in his letter 'To Young Political Workers' in that year, he is able to say, 'I am not a terrorist and I never was, except perhaps in the beginning of my revolutionary career.'[9] It is possible to argue, however, that the two statements are not inconsistent. Bhagat Singh does after all declaim to ever having had any pretence to being a 'terrorist', and comments as to how he was such a person even at the very beginning, is adorned with a caveat that should not be overlooked. Indeed, his statement in 1931 ends with the declaration that 'mere bomb-throwing is not only useless but sometimes harmful'.[10] This is not so far apart from what he had said at the beginning of his revolutionary journey in 1929
