> [i]mperialist designs shall no more actuate our dreamland people to wage wars. There shall be no more war trophies. The revolutionary armies shall march to other lands not to rule or loot the people, but to pull parasitic rulers down from their thrones and stop their blood seeking exploitation and thus to liberate the toiling masses. But, there shall not be the primitive national or racial hatred to goad our men to fight.[13]

That is not to say that war is essential at all because, as Bhagat Singh points out, '[t]he revolutionaries know better than anybody else that the socialist society cannot be brought about by violent means, but that it should grow and evolve from within'. This is why, while criticising 'the so-called League of Nations', he suggests that a 'world-federation is the most popular and immediate object of all the free thinking people . . .'.[14] As for constitutional reform, only a month before his execution, and while cognizant of the fact that he was going to die, Bhagat Singh wrote to young political workers on 2 February 1931 and described 'the scope of franchise' and recommended that '[t]he property qualifications making a man eligible to vote should be altogether abolished and universal suffrage be introduced instead. Every adult, both male and female, should have the right to vote'.[15] He did not stop there. Bhagat Singh wanted urgent democratic reform, which still eludes India today. He noted how 'we have the bicameral government. In my opinion the upper house is much a bourgeois superstition or trap. According to me unicameral government is the only best we can expect'. He then addresses 'provincial autonomy' and declares that 'I can only say that the Governor imposed from above, equipped with extraordinary powers, higher and above the legislative, shall prove to be no less than a despot' and suggests, '[l]et us better call it the "provincial tyranny" instead of "autonomy"' because it was 'a strange type of democratisation of the state institution'.[16] For all these reasons, he is impatient for complete freedom from British rule.

After Bhagat Singh's execution, fragments of a document came to light which had all the references to the Soviet Union, Marx, Lenin and the Communist Party expunged from it and published in a secret report in 1936 by the Government of India. The full report, in the form of a photostat copy, lies today preserved in Lucknow at the Martyrs' Memorial and Freedom
