There is nothing to fear in this because ‘even that death will be beautiful, but to commit suicide, to put an end to one’s life, to escape some suffering – that is cowardice’.[19] In so saying, Bhagat Singh reaches the heights of virtue, even as he suffers with Sukhdev, and addresses him in the letter as ‘dear brother’. In fact, his convictions have an aesthetic all of their own. This is clear from the way in which he admonishes Sukhdev, telling him that ‘the best part of self-experiment is – endure agony oneself’.[20] He then upbraids him, saying that ‘if you feel that life imprisonment is really humiliating, then why don’t you agitate against it and try to reform it?’.[21] If there ever was a call to reform Indian penal policy, this was it, and it came at the time of the revolutionaries’ most acute suffering. This ties in with what may be described as the particularity of revolutionary violence, as encapsulated by Giorgio Agamben where ‘[r]evolutionary violence is not a violence of means, aimed at the just end’ but that ‘[r]ather, it is a violence that negates the self’ and ‘it awakens a consciousness of the death of the self’. This is because ‘[o]nly the revolutionary class can know that enacting violence against the other inevitably kills the self’.[22] How does Bhagat Singh develop such a cogent and coherent theory of death for the revolutionary? The answer lies in his time in jail. Jail time on death row was necessary to prepare oneself for the ultimate sacrifice.
