happened and the suffering caused. I am pleased that today the UK-India relationship is one of collaboration, partnership, prosperity and security'. In the violence of the Jallianwala Bagh Massacre, however, there was the appearance of collusion between Sikh elites at the time and the perpetrators of these crimes.[8] Should that make a difference to whether or not an apology is given? It is noteworthy that at the time the leader of the Labour opposition, Jeremy Corbyn, has nevertheless demanded a full apology: 'I am very pleased that the prime minister mentioned what happened in Jallianwala Bagh and the issues of the massacre at Amritsar a hundred years ago. I think the people in memory of those that lost their lives and the brutality of what happened deserve a full, clear and unequivocal apology for what took place on that occasion.' However, as Mark Field, the junior minister in the foreign office, told MPs seeking the apology the previous day, the issue is a 'work in progress'.[9] Does this suggest that one may still be forthcoming?
