and dehumanised other races and cultures. We have a great responsibility to not just lament this horrific massacre but most importantly to learn from it in a way that changes our actions.'[11] Indeed, during Britain's 2019 parliamentary election, the Labour Party 'promised to tender a "formal apology" on behalf of the British government for the 1919 Jallianwala Bagh massacre, and hold a "public review" into the UK's role in the 1984 Operation Bluestar if it is voted to power in the December 12 elections', when its leader, Jeremy Corbyn, distanced himself from the simple expression of 'deep regret' which had been given by PM Theresa May when she was in office earlier in 2019.[12]