Partition was not addressed by either side. In that sense, the violence of Partition is not over. It continues today and it has come to haunt the Indian subcontinent. Ethnic divisions are still being stoked. Some see it is 'unfinished business' where the mixity, hybridity and cosmopolitanism of its millenia old society continue to be cleansed of their individual communities, which together had always enriched it like a richly embroidered mosaic. Bhagat Singh is relevant because he opposed sectarianism. Had Partition not happened, his legacy would have had a better chance of survival than it has otherwise done. India would have been different.

That is why Bhagat Singh remains as relevant today as he was during the days of imperial rule. For these reasons, it is in many ways rather pointless for India or Pakistan to be seeking atonement from Britain if the memorialization of their respective celebrated freedom has taken the form of a claim to freedom, which is as much a freedom from each other as it is a freedom from the coercive colonial rule of a foreign power. Today's governing party in India is formed from the political arm of the RSS. This is the organization to which Gandhi's assassin, Nathuram Godse, belonged. The banality of communal violence based on religious hatred is evident once again, as it was three-quarters of a century ago, when the Raj left ignominiously, having committed its own heresies. Mob killings, such as that of the dairy farmer Pehlu Khan, who was dragged and humiliated on a busy road in broad daylight even while he is seen on mobile video footage pleading for his life, are all too commonplace and frequent in their occurrences now. Instead of dealing with socio-economic disparities which grow incessantly by the day India, in 2022 stands obsessed, in the words of Pratap Bhanu Mehta, with the 'Hijab debate' which is nothing but ' a pretext for institutionalising state cruelty.'[6] Elsewhere the celebrated public intellectual, Noam Chomsky has lamented at how 'the pathology of Islamophobia' is 'taking its most lethal form in India' today where 'indian secular democracy' was being dismantled in order to turn the country into 'a Hindu ethnocracy.' [7] Others have decried the rise in India today of 'a state devoted to the humiliation of muslims.'[8] The ethnic cleansing at the time of
