(10) Even with the new trial before the special tribunal having commenced on 5 May 1930, the ever-astute Bhagat Singh remained troubled by how regular proceedings before a magistrate, running for nearly ten months and with over 200 witnesses already having been called, could just be abandoned on the spur of the moment. This is why on 19 June 1930, over a month after the Poonch House tribunal had begun to hear the case again, he asked for ‘the copy of the order of the Special Magistrate’ which was ‘dated 3 May 1930, according to which the inquiry proceedings in that court were stayed’. It seems remarkable that if proceedings were adjourned before the special magistrate, an order to that effect was not served on Bhagat Singh, especially when he was unrepresented (Lahore Archives, previously unpublished).
