[since] why should I not be allowed to see my relatives since the said interviews are essential for defence purposes?'. He accordingly rather suspected that 'the Order is meant simply to make a show that the accused are given proper facilities regarding their defence, but in reality nothing of the sort is done, on the contrary the defence is hampered at every step . . .' which means that 'all my petitions and representations are useless'. He was not very wrong, for such are the myriad ways in which the façade of the rule of law exposes itself to be a sham. Here was Bhagat Singh, as he explained, with his current lawyer, Dunni Chand, who also was now in jail. So Bhagat Singh argued that 'I want to engage a new one, which I cannot without the help and advice of my father'. His patience wears thin as he admonishes the authorities with the words that 'with no stretch of imagination can I understand as to why should the court of law join hands with the executive in such matters as immediately concerned with the administration of justice and be a party to the unnecessary harassment of the accused'. He ends with erudite eloquence and matchless acerbic wit as he 'earnestly requests the court to reconsider their Orders' and then 'to issue instructions to the jail authorities to allow all my interviews as long as the trial is going on' because the jail authorities 'will have time enough to treat us as they like after conviction' (Lahore Archives, previously unpublished).
