30. In the landmark UK Supreme Court case of Bancoult [2008] UKHL 61, consideration was given to the question of how a colonial power can 'make laws for the peace, order and good of the Territory', which was the issue in relation to the UK government's expulsion of the Chagos Islanders from the atoll of Diego Gracia in the Indian Ocean. Various judges, as the case progressed through the courts, took the view that UK ministers could not properly legislate in the interests of the UK as a whole (including its dependent territories), but only in the interests of the particular territory itself (per Laws LJ in Bancoult (No. 1) [2001] QB 1067) para 43). It was also suggested that 'even if its subject-matter is incontestably the colony, it is capable of being rendered invalid by jurisdictional error or malpractice . . . In the second place, it must also be open to challenge if its subject-matter, on examination, is manifestly not the peace, good order and good government of the colony' (per Sedley LJ in Bancoult [2007] EWCA Civ. 498).
